Educate others

Introduce a book or movie on slavery and trafficking into your book club, Sunday school, or other gathering.

Speak on a form of slavery in a class at your local middle school, high school or college. Sunday schools and youth groups are great venues as well to educate youth and young adults on these topics to not only curb demand through education, but also raise up future abolitionists.

Advocate

Ask your state legislators what they've done to stop sex trafficking and labor trafficking in your state. For more information on model state laws visit Polaris Project's webpage: <http://www.polarisproject.org/what-we-do/policy-advocacy/legislative-toolbox>

Find out what's happening in your state. Join Polaris Project's Grassroots Network at <http://www.polarisproject.org> to receive regular updates, maps, and alerts on legislative developments on trafficking in the United States. OR, read Shared Hope's National Report on Domestic Sex Trafficking at: http://www.sharedhope.org/Portals/0/Documents/SHI_National_Report_on_DMST_2009.pdf

Serve

Combat demand for victims of sex trafficking. Work in your community to seek the arrest of commercial sex buyers, develop deterrent sex offender programs, encourage victim-centered law enforcement to punish perpetrators and protect victims.

Choose not to tolerate the increasing normalization of commercial sex in our culture. For more information on getting help with sexual addictions visit:

Collect items for care packages for survivors. Collaborate with existing service providers to find out what they need.

Support: Get involved with organizations that are fighting trafficking:
